The spelling license, though still often met with, has no justification in the case of the sb. In the case of the vb, on the other hand, although the spelling licence is etymologically unobjectionable, license is supported by the analogy of the rule universally adopted in the similar pairs of related words, practice sb, practise vb, prophecy sb, prophesy vb (The rule seems to have arisen from imitation of the spelling of pairs like advice sb, advise vb, which expresses a phonetic distinction of historical origin) A slight argument for preferring the s form in the vb may be found in the existence of the derivatives licensable and licensure (U S) which could not conveniently be spelt otherwise

Johnson and Todd give only the form license both for the sb and the vb, but the spelling of their quots conforms, with one exception, to the rule above referred to, which is recognized by Smart (1836), and seems to represent the now prevailing usage Recent Dicts, however, almost universally have license both for sb and vb, either without alternative or in the first place]

The origin of the β type of forms (which survives in the usual British pronunciation, though the spelling represents the α type) is difficult to explain The hypothesis of a mere misinterpretation of the graphic form (u read as v), at first sight plausible, does not accord with the facts In view of the rare OF form lief for lieu (with which cf esp the 15th c Sc forms lief, lieffenaud above) it seems likely that the labial glide at the end of OF. lieu as the first element of a compound was sometimes apprehended by Englishmen as a v or f Possibly some of the forms may be due to association with Leave sb or Lief a

In 1793 Walker gives the actual pronunciations as (lev-, livte nănt), but expresses the hope that 'the regular sound, lewtenant' will in time become current In England this pronunciation (liute nănt) is almost unknown A newspaper quot of 1893 in Funk's Standard Dictionary says that (lefte nănt) is in the U S 'almost confined to the retired list of the navy']

d In scientific use

The word light has been used in six special senses: (a) the thing (variously conceived as matter or energy) which is communicated from a luminous body to the body illuminated by it, (b) this thing regarded as producing sensation, (c) the sensation produced; (d) the process (variously conceived as rectilinear motion of corpuscles, undulatory motion of the ether, or periodic change of electrical and magnetic states) by which the communication is made; (e) certain characteristics of such processes (rays or waves), (f) physical energies and processes of the same type as those involved in the production of vision, but having possibly a different range of periods (e g Röntgen rays) The sense (c) (rare in actual use, though not uncommonly expressed in definitions) agrees with an occasional use of the word in popular language we should, e g, usually apply the name light to the sensation experienced when the optic nerve is excited mechanically without the intervention of a luminous body In the sense (d) the word light is equivalent to the process of transmission of light, in the sense (e) it is equivalent to rays of light or waves of light

6. Used as conj . = 'like as', as. Now generally condemned as vulgar or slovenly, though examples may be found in many recent writers of standing

This use originated partly in an ellipsis of as or an extension of the quasi prepositional function of the adv (sense 1) to govern a clause instead of a sb , and partly in an anacoluthic use (somewhat common in the 16th c) by which the sb or pronoun which is primarily a dative governed by like is used as the subj. or obj. of a following clause A good example of this anacoluthon (but with to instead of simple dative) is the following 1596 Spenser F Q v iv 42 Like to an Eagle, in his kingly pride Soring through his wide Empire of the aire by chaunce hath spide A Goshauke.

-like, suffix, forming adjs. and advs In strictness, the words containing this suffix are compounds of Like a and adv, in the senses in which these words govern a dative or are followed by an adj (see Like a 1 b, Like adv 1, 3). The compounds so formed not unfrequently resemble in sense the derivatives formed with -lik(e, Me. dial. form of -ly¹, -ly², but the two formations are entirely distinct thus ME gredilike adv (=greedily) is not the same word as the mod Sc greedy-like

1 Appended to sbs a Forming adjs with the general sense 'similar to —', 'characteristic of, befitting —' Early examples are cnichtlyk (a 1420), chieftainlike (c 1470 Henry Wallace VI 489), devil-like (c 1470), godlike (1513), bishoplike (1544), flesh-like (1552) The suffix may now be appended to almost all sbs, including proper names, in formations intended as nonce-words, or not generally current, the hyphen is ordinarily used

Some particular writers have shown an extraordinary fondness for words of this formation, e g more than 60 occur in Bailey's Festus

b Forming adjs with the sense 'in or after the manner of —', 'so as to resemble —' Early instances are fellowlake (c 1530), gentlemanlike (1542), phraselike (1549), bishoplike (1555) These advs, and the method of formation, are now perh to be regarded as obsolete or at least archaistic, the apparent examples in recent use being explicable as quasi-advbs uses of the adj, at least, the advs or quasi-advs. are now employed only to characterize the subject of the sentence, not, as formerly, to indicate the manner of an action In accordance with this change of signification, -like in the quasi-adverbial use now takes optionally a second principal stress, and is nearly always hyphened

3. The alkaline earth which is the chief constituent of mortar, calcium oxide (CaO). It is obtained by submitting limestone (carbonate of lime) to a red heat, by which the carbonic acid is driven off, leaving a brittle white solid, which is pure lime (or Quick-lime) It is powerfully caustic and combines readily with water, evolving great heat in the process, and forming hydrate of lime (slaked lime)

The designations carbonate, phosphate etc of lime are still current in popular use, though in technical language they have given place to the more systematic terms calcium carbonate (or carbonate of calcium), etc Chloride of lime see Chloride 2

Ling, variant of LENG v. Obs

-ling (liŋ), *suffix*¹, appended to sbs, adjs., vb.-stems, and (rarely) advs., to form sbs, is a Com. Teut. formative (OE, OS., OHG -ling, ON. -lingr, Goth. -ligs in gadiliggs). It doubtless arose from the addition of the suffix -ingo-z -ING 3 to noun-stems formed with the suffix -lo- (-EL¹, -LE 1), but in all the historical Teut. langs it has the character of a simple suffix.

1. In OE, -lang added to sbs. forms sbs. with the general sense 'a person or thing belonging to or concerned with (what is denoted by the primary sb), as hỳrling hireling, serðling ploughman (f serð ploughing), rǽpling prisoner (f rǽp rope). The derivatives from adjs have the sense 'a person or thing that has the quality denoted by the adj.', e.g déorling darling, efenling an equal, feorðling quarter, farthing, geongling youngling, gesibling, sibling kinsman; similarly from an adv, underling subordinate One or two names of birds have this suffix in OE., as sweartling ? some black bird (? f sweart black), stærling starling, here it may possibly have a diminutive force (see 2 below)

In ME and mod.E the suffix continued to be freely employed with the same function as in OE.; examples are atterling, deathling, fatling, fostling, grayling, nestling, nurseling, saplyng, suckling The personal designations in -ling are now always used in a contemptuous or unfavourable sense (though this implication was not fully established before the 17th c.), as cowerling, earthling, groundling, †popeling (= papist), vanling, worldling On the analogy of words like nurseling, where the grammatical character of the initial element is ambiguous, a few sbs in -ling have been formed on vb.-stems (taken in passive sense), being personal designations of contemptuous import, such as shameling, starveling, of similar origin is stripling, though it has lost its primary derisive sense.

The suffix is no longer productive in the uses above explained.

2. In ON the suffix had a diminutive force, of which there are only slight traces in the other Teut langs. (cf OE stærling mentioned above, and G sperling sparrow), chiefly in words denoting the young of animals, as gǽslingr gosling, kettlingr kitten, kiðlingr young kid, 'kidling', but also in a few other words, as hǽklingr hooklet, vetlingr glove, ormlingr little worm. In Eng the earliest certain instance of this use appears to be codling, recorded c 1314 (kithing, which appears a 1300, being of dubious formation), in the 15th c we find gosling (of which the earliest quoted form, gesling, points to adoption from ON), and duckling In the 16th c and subsequently the suffix has been employed in many new diminutive formations, chiefly contemptuous appellations of persons, as godling, lordling, kingling, princeling, in this use it is still a living formative

In the formation of diminutives expressing merely smallness of size, -ling has never been extensively used; a few writers of the 19th c. have so employed it in nonce-wds.

-ling², -lin(g)s, suffix, forming adverbs, most of which survive only dial The Teut. root lingg-*, lagg-, lugg-, to extend, reach, appears in its three ablaut-forms as the terminal element in certain OE advs expressive of direction or extent, as in bæcling BACKLING, andlang (see ALONG, ENDLONG), nihtlanges for a night, grundlinga (also grundlinga) to the ground In certain instances the suffixes -linga, -lunga, were already in OE. substituted for -inga, -unga, advb. terminations originating in some case (? ablative) of sbs. in -ing, -ung (see -ING¹); so in néadlunga, nédlinga, whence, with adverbial (genitival) es, the ME. nedlingis NEEDLINGS, of necessity The original OE use (in which the suffix is added to sbs. to form advs. of direction) is continued in the later formations grufelyng (GROVELLING), headling's, sideling(s; more numerous, however, are the words in which the suffix forms advs. of condition or situation from adjs, as blindling(s, darkling(s, firstlings, flatling(s, hidlings, mostlings

The Gr word was perh adopted from some foreign lang ; a noteworthy similarity of sound is presented by Heb. אַרְיֵה lāvē lion (pl. lᵉvāʾīm), also occurring in the sense 'lioness' with the vocalization lᵉbhiyyā; cf also Egyptian labai, lawai lioness The synonymous Gr. λίς (cf. Heb לָיִשׁ layish) is not etymologically connected.

Before the adoption of the Fr. word, English possessed forms directly representing the Latin leo, leōnem. The word was used, with difference of gender and inflexion, both for 'lion' and 'lioness', the L. leæna not having been adopted. Owing to the two-fold form of the L word in the nom and the oblique case, the declension in OE is irregular and variable. The recorded forms are: nom. sing. léo (Anglian léa), gen. sing léon (Northumb. masc. léas), dat sing léon, léone, Lonaan, acc. sing léon (fem also léo), nom , acc pl. léon, gen. pl léona, dat. pl léonum, léom, léonum.

1. A large carnivorous quadruped, Felis leo, now found native only in Africa and southern Asia, of a tawny or yellowish brown colour, and having a tufted tail The male is distinguished by a flowing shaggy mane (The Maneless Lion of Gujerat is a recognized Asiatic variety with only a slight mane) It is very powerful, and has a noble and impressive appearance; whence it is sometimes called 'the king of beasts'. In early use the name was applied to both sexes; from the 13th c. the derivative LIONESS has been used for the female.

The young are now commonly called 'lion's cubs'; the older designation 'lion's whelp' survives in rhetorical applications, owing to its use in the Bible.

Lite, obs form of LIGHT v.[1]

-lite (—F -lite, G. -lith, -lit), a frequent ending in names of minerals (also in names of certain fossils, as coprolite, and of certain types of mineral structure, as axiolite), represents the Gr λίθος stone, the words in which it occurs are mostly intended to correspond to assumable Gr formations, so that in actual use the ending is almost always -olite, with the thematic or combining o usual in Gr compounds, there are a few exceptions, as auerlite, chesterlite. The form -lite, which was used in some original English formations (actynolite, etc.) by Kirwan in 1794, is due to the example of the French geologists, who used -lite instead of the older -lithe, the two spellings representing one and the same pronunciation in Fr. The adoption of the abnormal form was prob. helped by the analogy of CHRYSOLITE, where the t instead of th is due to the fact that the Gr. word came at an early period into Eng. by way of med.L. and OF.
